Trudeau: from pm to president?

According to the Simon Fraser University student newspaper, "The Peak", Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau has submitted an application for the post of president of the university.

In an article last Friday, the newspaper said the prime minister reportedly submitted an application just before nominations closed last week. The current president, Kenneth Strand, retires next September.

The Peak said John Wheatley, Simon Fraser's dean of graduate studies, has been in contact with Ottawa during the past few months and that Strand talked to Trudeau in Ottawa recently.

Trudeau, the paper said, will apparently retire from politics because some of his cabinet and some Liberal riding associations do not think he can win another election.

The Peak reported the prime minister will be the next Simon Fraser administration president.

The presidential search committee has apparently been sworn to secrecy in the presence of RCMP officials. The Peak said it got its information from a "usually reliable source". Frank Rotering, editor of the Peak, said he is "99 per cent sure" his information is correct.

Rumours of Trudeau's impending resignation have been circulating in Ottawa in the last few weeks.

According to Claude Balloune in the November issue of Last Post magazine:

"The bourgeois French-Canadian grapevine in Montreal is circulating a rather interesting story concerning Pierre Elliot Trudeau. This grapevine, which is Trudeau's milieu, says that the prime minister intends to resign shortly, possibly at the end of November, and return home to academic life."

Forum on Middle East

There will be no peace solution in the Middle East, until the rights of the indigenous people of Palestine are gained, a representative of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) said Friday night.

The PLO representative, Abdullah, was speaking on the current situation in the Middle East at a forum sponsored by the Arab Students' Association at McGill.

"Peace in the Middle East will emerge only if the rights of the Palestinians are restored," he said. "This means restoration of the right of self-determination in our country, in Palestine."

The solution to the (Palestinian) problem, according to Abdullah, would be the construction of a free, democratic state in Palestine, where citizens could enjoy equal status regardless of race, origin, or religion. In such a state, he said,

Jews would retain the right to practice their religion and speak their languages. "Jews would be neither oppressed or oppressors."

Abdullah emphasized that the current fight was not "launched in 1973, but was a resumption of fighting from 1967 and from 1917 — after the Balfour declaration." He said, however, that this was the first time that "actual Arab unity was demonstrated, as well as international support from Third World countries."

Twenty-nine countries broke diplomatic relations with Israel during the last six months.

Abdullah said the "revenge of the Palestinians for their 25 year exile would be the creation of a democratic state." "Our struggle will not be the struggle of Arabs, of Palestinians, but of the Third World, of peace-loving nations throughout the world. We will continue holding weapons until that time."

The other speaker at the forum, Dr. Yehya Abubakr, the director of the Arab Information Centre in Ottawa, focused on oil and the attitude of the U.S. towards the Arabs.

Abubakr quoted Mitchell Sharp, the external affairs minister, saying that Canada would not cut off oil to the U.S. to appease the Arabs. "Nixon could dictate the export of Canadian oil to America because of American ownership of the Canadian petroleum industry. By the same principle, Nixon claims that oil produced in Arab countries is American oil," Abubakr said. He explained, "Oil produced in Arab countries is a natural resource of the Arabs — it is their oil."

He also said there was a time when the U.S. offered only four cents a barrel for Arab oil because of a feeling of cultural superiority. Abubakr termed this "cultural exploitation." "The U.S. said to the Arabs, 'You can live in tents. We need luxury. It would take you years to get used to luxury anyhow,'" said Abubakr.

He discussed the western commercial media stereotype of Arabs as "forbidding black-mailers." He then asked if Alberta was a blackmailer with its oil, or Manitoba with its grain, or the United States "of the whole world."

In the discussion period that followed Abdullah's speech, the PLO representative said that reports that Palestinian leaders had accepted invitations to the December peace conference were false. He said that one Egyptian newspaper, and the French paper Le Monde had spread the story that the Palestinian leaders had accepted, but that this was false as yet. "It is just a speculation whether they will attend," he said.

Katz on drugs

by John Van Toch

Dr. Murray Katz said yesterday evening that there is a critical lack of communication between the medical profession and the public.

Speaking to an audience of about 40, primarily physical and occupational therapy students, at a lecture in the McIntyre Medical Building, he said that doctors are taught throughout medical school to be secretive and condescending toward their patients.

Compounding the problem, Dr. Katz explained, is the profound effect that pharmaceutical firms have in forming a doctor's attitude toward his patients. The advertisements in pharmaceutical magazines are a doctor's only source of information about new drugs once he graduates and in many instances they can be false and dangerous. Among many examples, Dr. Katz pointed to the thalidomide tragedy which he claims was due mainly to misleading advertising.

Faced with these problems, Dr. Katz suggests that the public should be protected by four "basic rights". The most fundamental of these is the public's right to communicate with the members of the medical profession, he said.

The public "must have a chance to work with us on a more equal basis," Katz explained, referring to the public's increasing suspicion and lack of confidence in the entire "medical team".

Doctors, Katz said, must regain the personal aspect in their relationship with patients that was lost when they stopped making house calls and began prescribing drugs for every ailment. He said many people are reluctant to seek proper medical attention, even though they may need it, because they dislike the doctor's attitude.

The proper use of prescription drugs was cited as a patient's second right. Physicians must be able to tell patients exactly what the prescribed drug does and why, as well as how it can be purchased most cheaply. Hospitals and medical schools must also "realize that they are the patsies of drug companies", Katz said.

The public should also have "access to all members of the health team". Doctors, he claimed, have inflated impressions of their competence and rarely consult nurses, physiotherapists, or other members of the "health team" who might be better suited to treat a particular problem, such as the social aspects of doctor-patient relations.

Finally, the public should have a right to participate in decisions involving health care, Katz said. The decision to close the Catherine Booth Hospital, for example, should be put to the public, as well as questions of hospital functions like free ambulance service, house calls, and continuing drug education for practitioners.

Katz said the medical profession, with all its expertise, must now try to re-establish personal relations with the public and bring the two groups closer together. "We have the medical resources to provide proper health care," Dr. Katz concluded. "The trouble is we don't use them properly."

LEAN AND HUNGRY/BY GEORGE KOPP

Politics accentuate Ethiopian drought

by Craig Toomey

Fewer countries in Africa have been affected more by the drought than Ethiopia. What follows is an attempt to explain how the political situation in that nation has directly determined the size of the present disaster.

Famine and death ravaged Ethiopia for more than six months before the outside world was given the slightest hint of the situation. This is the third serious drought to go unreported in "The Hidden Empire" in the last 20 years and, unfortunately, may not be the last. Observers estimate that more than 100,000 people have already died and that the two-year-old drought has wiped out 88 per cent of the nation's cattle. Large areas of crops have also been devastated, leaving a grim future for the 25 million inhabitants of Ethiopia.

The present tragedy in Ethiopia is only the latest example of the government's attempts to divert economic priorities to maintain the country's status among other African nations. Emperor Haile Selassie, ruler of Ethiopia for over 50 years, has consistently placed his country's political prestige above all other needs. In an effort to maintain his reputation as the "father of African unity", he has made Ethiopia's capital, Addis Ababa, the host to the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the UN's Economic Commission for Africa.

As a result, Addis Ababa has become one of the most modern cities in Africa, while the Ethiopian population continues to live in extreme squalor. Disease, poverty, illiteracy and starvation are widespread throughout the country.

Feudalism

The mass of the Ethiopian population has suffered for centuries under the rule of a feudal land-owning elite. The archaic and inflexible political structure that has survived until today has kept Ethiopia one of the most oppressive feudalistic nations in the world. All but 200,000 of its inhabitants are engaged in agriculture, but less than 30 per cent of the farmers own their own land. The majority are tenant farmers who pay crushingly heavy rents — often more than half their crops — to landlords.

The government of Ethiopia is in the hands of the minority Amhara tribe. It is a non-party constitutional monarchy headed by the Emperor, who is considered to be the elect of God by his highly religious people. Haile Selassie claims as well to be a direct descendant of King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba.

Haile Selassie is best known for his famous, yet unsuccessful plea, to the League of Nations in 1935, asking for protection against Mussolini's fascist and savage invasion of his country. Because of that event he has remained a highly respected figure in international circles.

Student discontent

On the home front, Selassie's government has recently come under much criticism. The changes he has made during 50 years of rule have been insufficient to meet the needs of the people. His programs of modernization, mass education and the improvement of health facilities have brought advantages only to the wealthy elite in the country. His conservative stand on domestic issues resulted in massive unemployment and the stagnation of the economy.

Violent demonstrations have repeatedly erupted in Addis Ababa since 1968. Students have expressed their discontent with the archaic form of government. They have also demanded an end to the presence of American imperialist organizations throughout the country.

Selassie has continually blamed the disturbances on communist infiltrators and provocateurs. The 86-year-old emperor has repeatedly closed Haile Selassie I University and has imprisoned or deported student leaders. On several occasions, police have fired directly into rioting crowds of students, killing and injuring scores of them. Six Soviet and Czech officials, expelled from the country after the riots of March 1969, were accused of "subversive activities".

Many observers have said that the only factor preventing a peasant revolution in Ethiopia is the belief held by the Cushitic majority and the Amharic minority, that Haile Selassie is the elect of God. In 1960, a coup by military leaders was crushed by the Emperor's special U.S. trained military force.

U.S. Involvement

Ethiopia today maintains the largest standing army in Africa. The army is trained by a large number of U.S. military advisors. The U.S. has poured more than $12 million into this program — roughly 60 per cent of its military grants to all of Africa in 1971. U.S. technical assistance totalled $5 million and development loans $15 million for the same year. The United States government is determined to maintain its interests in Ethiopia despite increasing resistance from the population. In fact, its stranglehold on the economic and political system is rapidly increasing.

Eritrea

Besides the drought and student unrest, the biggest thorn in the emperor's side is Eritrea. This strip of land on Ethiopia's east coast bordering the Red Sea and Indian Ocean provides an outlet for Ethiopia at the ports of Massawa and Assab. In 1950 the UN assembly decided that Eritrea should constitute "an autonomous unit federated with Ethiopia under the sovereignty of the Ethiopian crown." The emperor immediately sent in military forces to enforce what many considered an unjust decision. Ever since, vicious clashes have arisen between these troops and members of the Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF). This conflict remains one of the least publicized African struggles today.

The drought

The drought now raging in Ethiopia has been greatly prolonged and sharpened by the inadequacies of the Ethiopian Government. By covering up the disaster to maintain prestige and a healthy tourist industry, it has directly endangered almost one fifth of Ethiopia's 25 million people. Massive relief is needed to prevent a tragedy of incomparable magnitude.

The contradictions and contrasts are many in the land where there are "13 months of sunshine", and these have been brought to a head by the present disaster. One can only hope that the events of the past two years will set off changes to prevent similar disasters from occurring again.

Greek demo draws 2000

About 2000 people demonstrated Sunday in front of the Greek and American embassies to protest renewed violence in Greece.

The violence occurred last week, when the country's military government forcibly cleared students from Athens' Polytechnical School. Several students were killed, and the junta declared martial law in the country.

Greece only recently had regained civilian government after seven years of military rule.

According to spokesmen for the McGill Hellenic Club, the demonstrators Sunday carried placards demanding the immediate overthrow of the junta.

A resolution passed by the demonstrators called upon the Canadian government to withdraw all support from the regime. It also invited the Quebec government, the provincial political parties, the church and the labour unions and the general population to denounce recent brutalities.

A third point of the resolution urged the Canadian press and mass media to expose "the Greek tragedy in all its dimensions" in accordance with the "provisions of their professional code of ethics."

The resolution also appealed to the Canadian people and world public to denounce the "organized slaughter" perpetrated "with American arms...under the direction of the Americans and for the interests of American imperialism."

The resolution saluted the resistance of the Greek people, and called upon the Montreal Greek community to "join forces...against tyranny, against imperialism and against fascism."

Sports

Girls volley into third place

by Ellen Einterz

The McGill women's volleyball team took sole possession of third place in the QUAA this weekend by solidly defeating three of the five teams they faced in Saturday's tournament held at Currie Gym. Playing two games with each of Loyola, Sherbrooke, Laval, Mac-Jac, and SGWU, McGill recorded six wins and four losses for the day, bringing their season record after two tournaments to an even ten wins and ten losses.

Revitalized after their disappointing first tournament, McGill came onto the court ready to play and prove themselves. They began by hitting Loyola. Receiving sets from Betty Koch and Val Taylor, spikers Barb Dawson, Wendy Linton, and Allison Doupe slammed one ball after another while heading for a comfortable final score of 4-15 in favour of McGill. Allison Doupe provided most of McGill's spiking attack during the second game against Loyola, with Val Taylor making ten successive serves to complete the McGill win at 6-15.

McGill's next competitor was Sherbrooke, the team which currently holds first place in the Quebec league. Although equipped with a consistently successful spike, Sherbrooke was unable to play up to their usual standard: serves were not hard, spikes were not as well placed as they normally are, and volleyed returns were not as powerful. If McGill had continued to play the aggressive ball they had played against Loyola, the match would have been a close one. Unfortunately, McGill needlessly shirked when faced with the spirited, confident French team. Set-ups were clumsy, spikes went into the net, bumps lacked control, and serves — which against Loyola had been strong and accurate — against Sherbrooke were weak and erratic. McGill lost both games, 15-2 then 15-0.

Desire to win

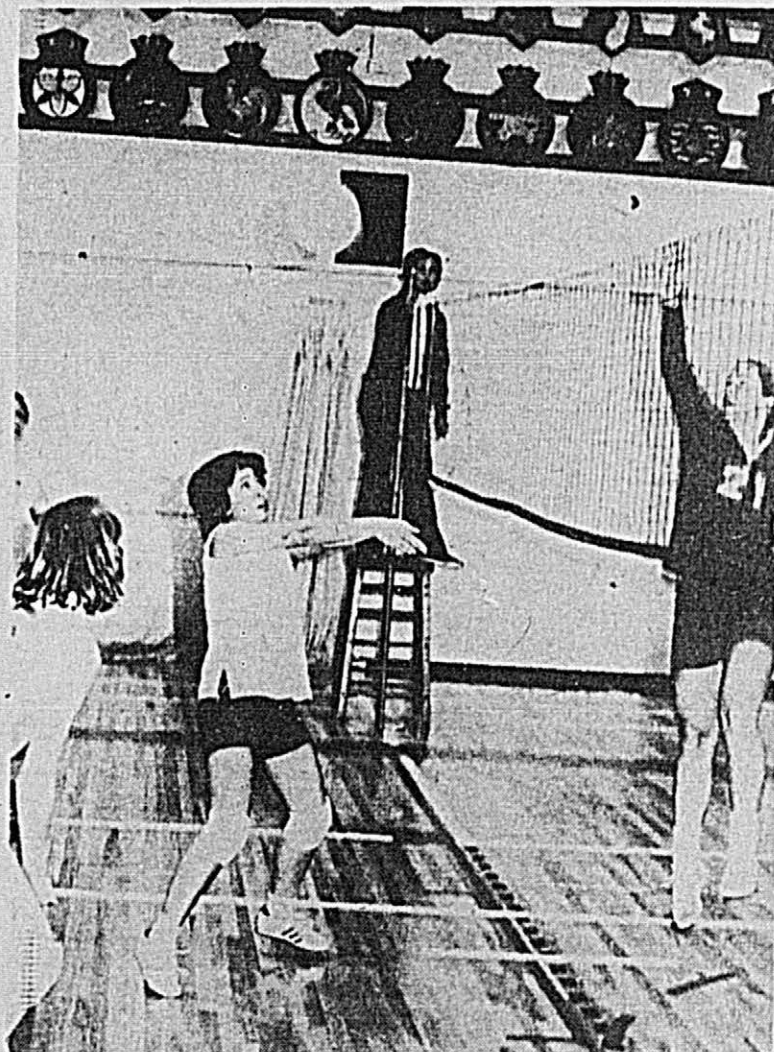

Against Laval, McGill overlooked the Sherbrooke disaster and came back with the desire to win. Corrine Champagne was a major spark in the first game, as the team pulled together with good sets, spikes, and coverage. To the McGill effort Val Taylor and Barb Dawson each contributed several successful serves, while Allison gave the necessary timely, unreturned spikes. McGill led the game from the beginning until the score read 9-13. At that point, Laval began to press and McGill was unable to keep control. The defending Quebec champions scored six unanswered points to end the game at 15-13. Having lost much of the motivation which had made them fight so hard in the first game, McGill failed repeatedly to keep the ball in-bounds during the second game, as they went down to Laval 15-2.

Macdonald-John Abbott College had particular trouble picking up the serves of Stella Srebrnik in McGill's next match, and as a result were humbled 5-15 and 7-15 by the Super Squaws. Stella, Barb Dawson, and Brenda Thompson furnished most of the spiking power in the two games.

McGill's last opponent of the day was SGWU. Profiting by their own confidence and by the lackadaisical attitude of the Georgians, McGill easily and quickly out-classed Sir George, 5-15 and 3-15.

In two weeks, McGill travels to Universite Laval to compete in the QUAA's third tournament. If they are able to buckle down and play as well as they have shown, coach Anne Patterson's team just might break through and surprise the two teams which have dominated the Quebec volleyball league for a few too many years.
